

The Story of Nellie Cashman

Several independent-minded women came West in the 19th century, some with the dream of getting rich, some with the fear of how they would survive the frontier. Few enjoyed the prosperity or interesting experiences of a petite Irish lady named Nellie Cashman.

A restless adventurer, Cashman roamed the Old West for 50 years, prospecting for gold and spreading goodwill. She amassed and then lost or gave away a number of fortunes during her lifetime.

Cashman established restaurants and boarding houses in several western boomtowns, including the notorious Tombstone, never refusing a meal or a room to a down-and-out miner who couldn't pay. She enjoyed making money but often spent it on charitable causes as quickly as she earned it. Her philanthropic deeds earned her the respectful title of "Angel of the Mining Camps." While Nellie never shed the prospector's wanderlust, another group of pioneering women in northern Arizona was trying to find ways to settle in and, perhaps, recapture a more civilized lifestyle they had known back East.

Prescott, Arizona, was a rough and ready town in its early days, full of boisterous miners and devil-may-care cowboys. The town's rough edged male population was described as mostly unmarried, unchurched and unwashed. Seeing the need for refinement, a group of women organized the Monday Club in 1895.

Thirty women attended the first meeting to discuss cultural programs involving music, civic improvement and education. One of their first missions "in the interest of sanitation and cleanliness," was to persuade city fathers to pass an ordinance prohibiting spitting on the sidewalks.

The Monday Club's legacy continues today. One of the oldest continually active clubs in Arizona, the organization sponsors children's charities, scholarships and cultural growth in the Prescott community. (And, since they don't allow spitting on their sidewalks, we hope you honor that rule at this resort, as well.)
